in the Life of Mexico
To-day

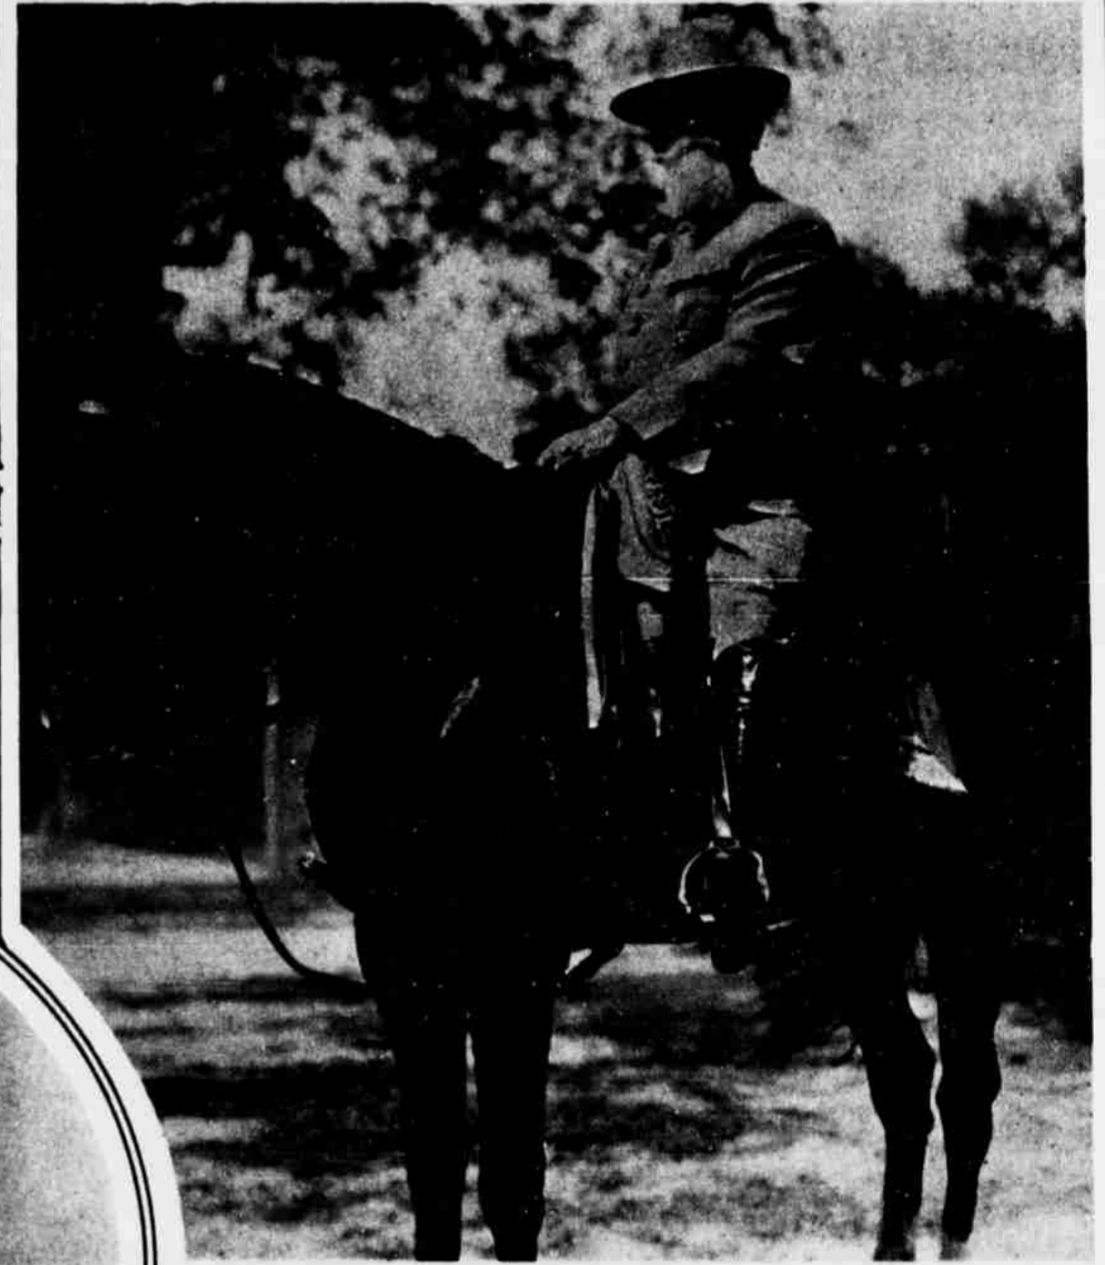

The rulers of Mexico. President Carranza and his son-in-law, Secretary of State Aguilar, on the veranda of Chapultepec Castle.

A review in Mexico City of the troops which have been especially recruited to protect railway trains from bandits. Lawless conditions in many parts of the country have made this protection necessary. The soldiers, most of them young men, have done excellent work.
Photos from Geo. D. Wright's Mexican Tropics, Released by Educational.

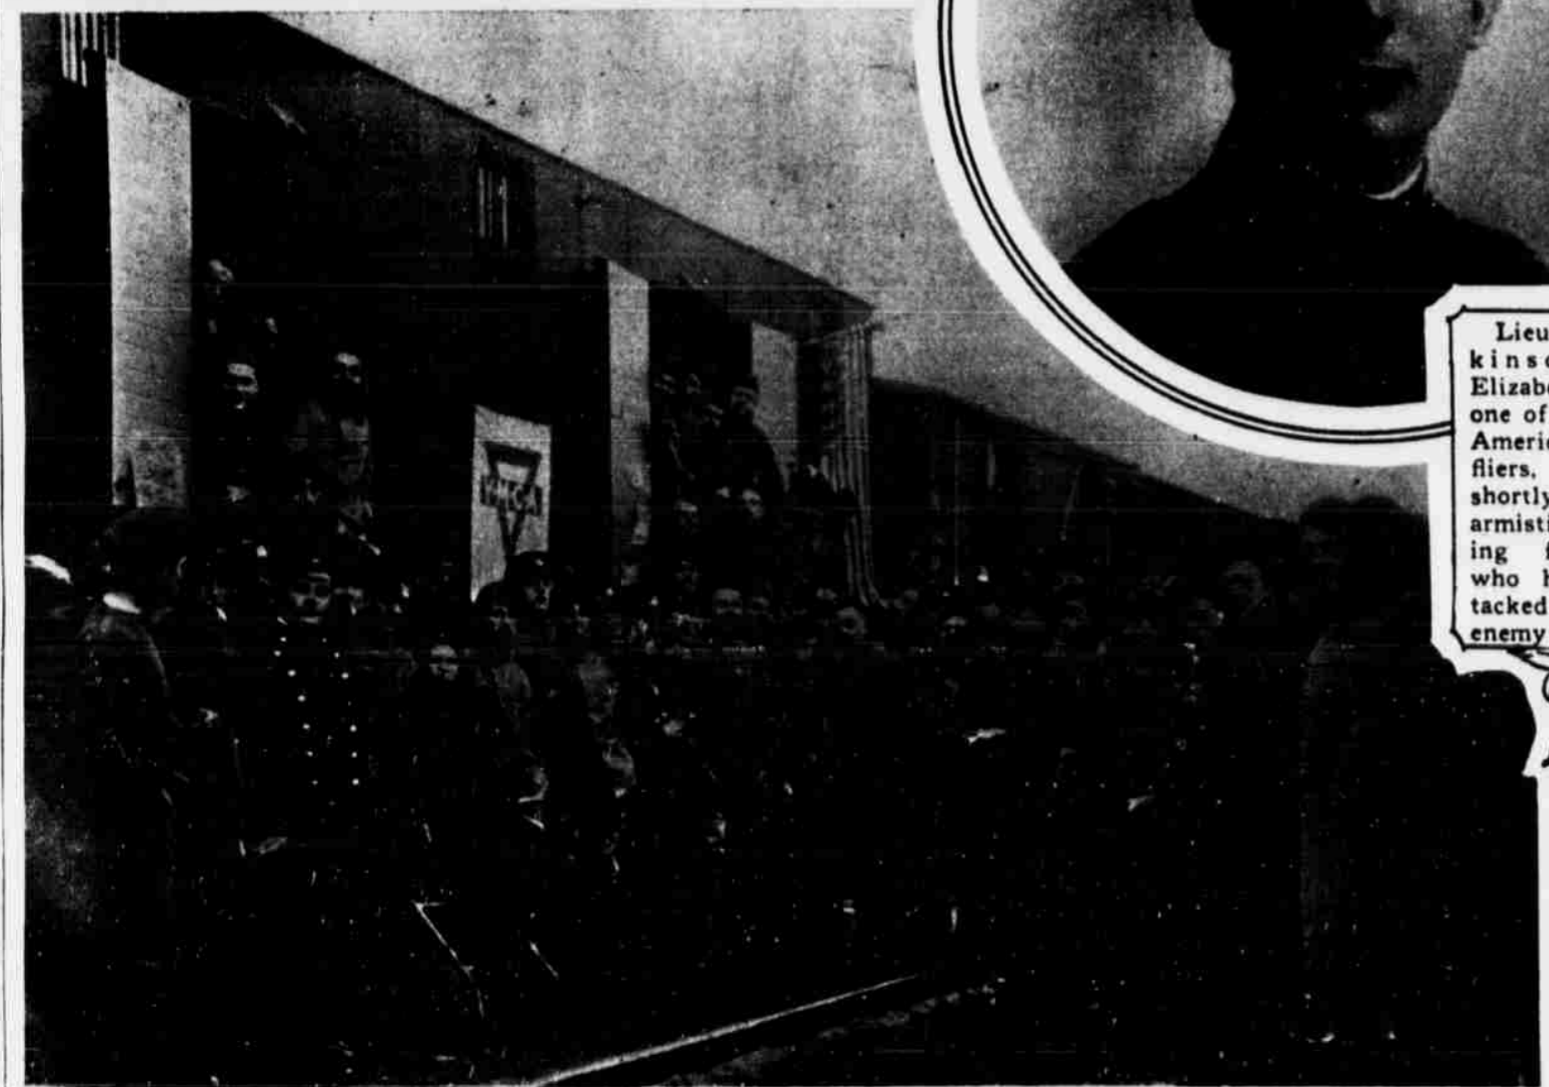

Headquarters in Mexico City of the Committee on Public Information from which the insidious propaganda instigated by the German Minister was fought. Daily bulletins told the truth about the way the war was going.

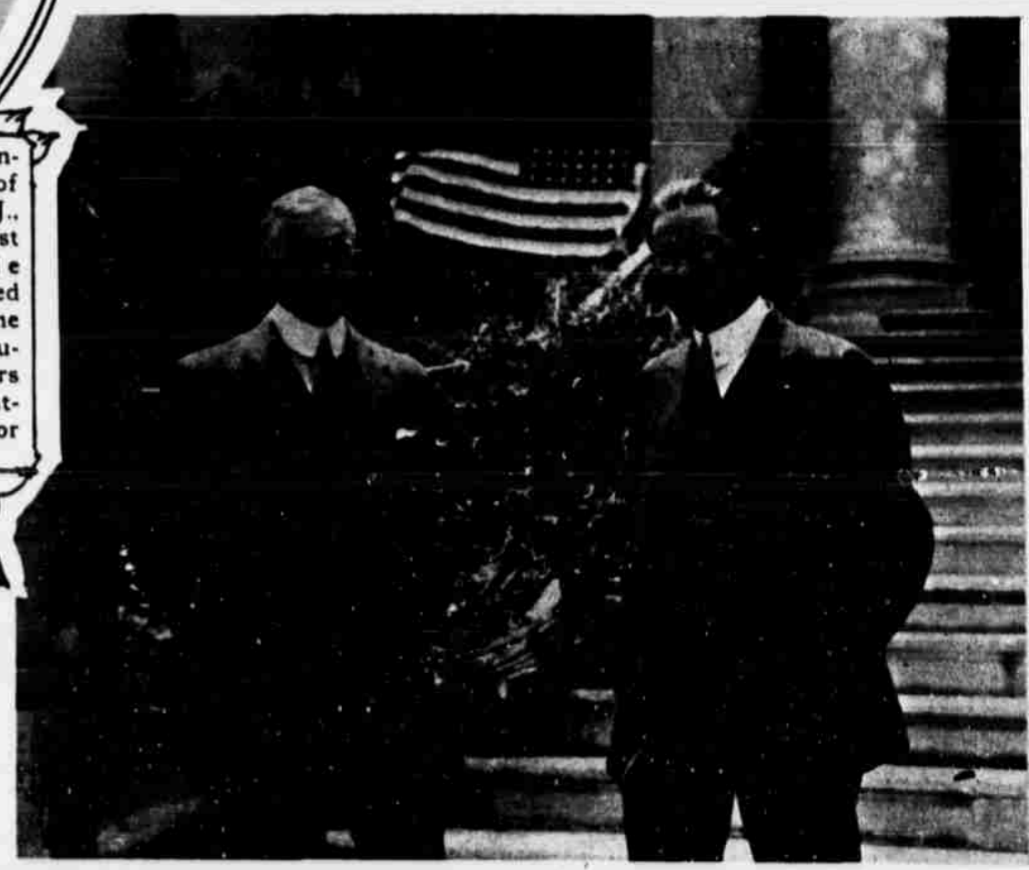

President Carranza on his favorite horse about to start out on his daily constitutional. Riding has kept him in splendid physical condition.

Lieut. Harry Jenkinson, Jr., of Elizabeth, N. J., one of the foremost American battle fliers, was killed shortly before the armistice in rescuing fellow fliers who had been attacked by superior enemy forces.

Spectators and principals in a boxing match at the camp of the allied armies in Archangel. An American soldier and a French "Blue Devil" have been amusing their comrades by a friendly bout in front of the Y. M. C. A. headquarters car.

United States Ambassador Henry P. Fletcher and George D. Wright, who took these pictures. Mr. Fletcher's diplomacy and intimate knowledge of Mexicans have done much to smooth out misunderstandings between the countries and to pave the way for amicable relations in the future.
